SPECIALIZATION

My research focuses on the long-term impact of emigration on human development. Specifically, I analyze the manner in which Mexican diaspora communities in the US affect migrant hometown communities back in Mexico. I began this work with a study of the relationship between remittances and human development in central Mexico. Recently, however, I expanded my research to address two new lines of inquiry.

The first line of study addresses the impact of return migrants on human development within migrant-sending regions. My preliminary findings indicate that return migrants improve development outcomes in the areas they decide to resettle in. The second line of work explores the relationship between mass emigration and violence in Mexico. This project builds on an existing literature that finds that immigrant concentration correlates with lower crime rates in US cities. My work compliments this research by addressing the effects of out migration on crime rates in Mexico. Early findings indicate that crime rates increase at quicker rates in Mexican regions experiencing high levels of emigration.

FIELD WORK

2014-Present Emigration and Crime: This project addresses the potential link between mass emigration and crime in modern Mexico. For this study I am gathering homicide data from each of Mexico's 2,445 municipalities with the purpose of comparing homicide trends while controlling for levels of emigration. I am also conducting interviews with officials and key informants living in migrant-sending regions in central Mexico.

2013-Present Return Migration: In this project I focus on the long-term effects of emigration on Mexican communities. Specifically, I study the impact of return migrants on community wellbeing. To this end, I am compiling data from multiple state sources and conduct interviews with local officials and former migrants.

2008-2013 Research of Mexican Hometown Associations (HTAs): Interviews conducted with grassroots organizers/leaders and government officials in the U.S. and Mexico. This study focused on the role of migrants in underpinning development in rural Mexico. A major element of this project has involved the gathering and compilation of data on the Mexican program 3 X 1 para migrantes into a central database that I can use to evaluate the investment patterns of HTAs in rural Mexico. This project uses both quantitative and qualitative methods.

2009 On the Edge of Paradise: For this project I conducted a seven-week study of a Nicaraguan migrant community located on the edge of San José, Costa Rica. Research focused on the impact of global economic structures on migration trends. I conducted 40 interviews in Spanish and took extensive field notes. This project was largely qualitative in nature.

2004 Oral History of a Sandanista Barrio: I conducted research in the resource-deprived neighborhood of Maximo Jerez, located in Managua, Nicaragua. As part of this project, I lived with a Nicaraguan family and carried out a six-week long ethnographic research project concerning the historical resistance of the people living in Maximo Jerez. This project was conducted in conjunction with the study abroad project, Revolution, Transformation, and Society, which is run by the School for International Training.

STUDENT-LED RESEARCH

2015-Present Voices of the Valley: This work focuses on the San Luis Valley, which is located in southern Colorado. The project, which engages Adams State University students in field research, focuses on the relationship between immigration, sustainable development, and land management in the region. This project is supported by generous grants from Title V ($5,000), and the Bureau of Land Management ($30,000). Research for this project is underway and is scheduled to run through 2016.
